WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

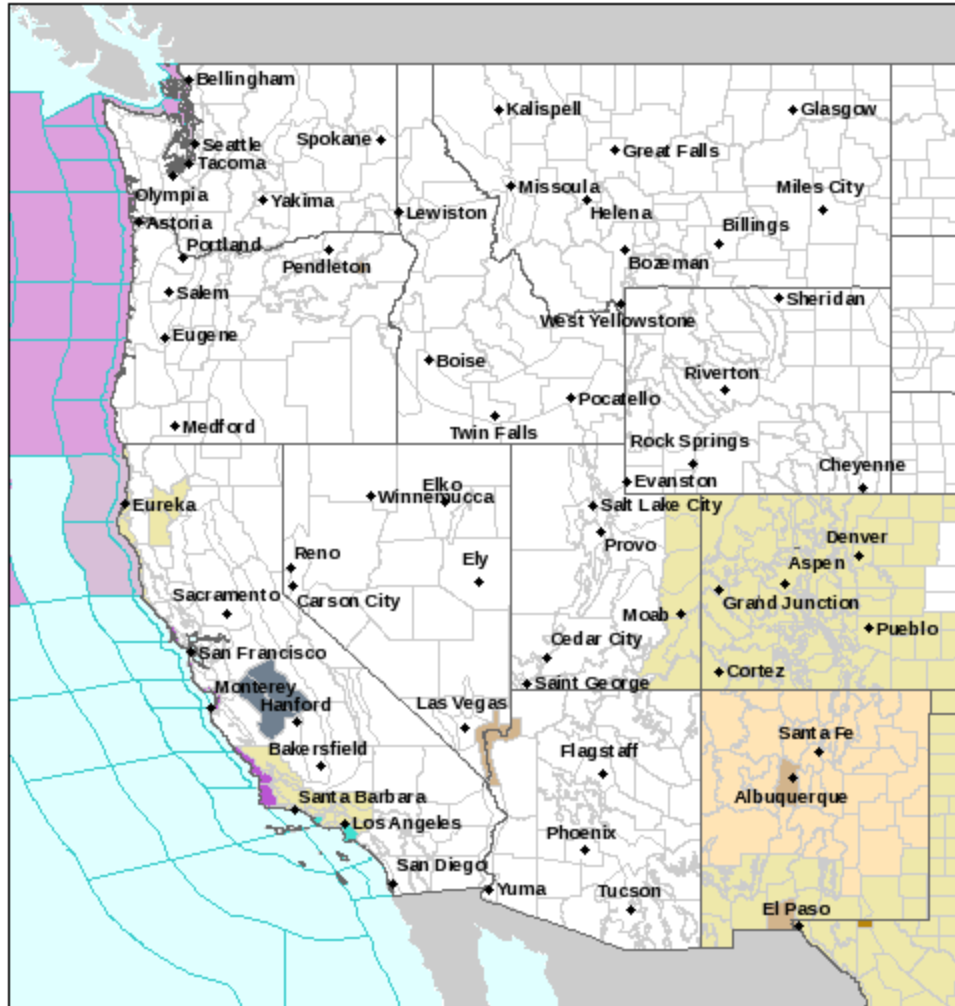

A high pressure ridge over the region this morning will move off to the east this afternoon. Partly cloudy and mild weather is expected through midday today. A weak front approaching the coast will cause high clouds and southerly winds to increase across the region this afternoon. Southerly gusts will reach 25-35 mph in wind-prone areas in the north this afternoon. The front will move into far northwest California this evening with light rain, but it will stall there and dissipate early Thursday. Fair, mild and breezy weather can be expected Thursday through Saturday. A stronger frontal system will move onshore late Saturday with moderate to heavy rain, and move fairly quickly across the region, exiting by Sunday evening. Snow levels will be 5000-6000 feet. High pressure will follow early next week, but more wet weather systems are expected to follow. Temperatures will warm to around seasonal normals or slightly above late this week, to around 70 for the warmest inland areas.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

A weak low pressure area over southwestern Arizona along with high pressure aloft will produce sunny and warmer weather the next few days. At the current time, northerly pressure gradients are producing gusty winds north winds of 20-30 mph across northern Los Angeles County eastward into the Cajon Pass and San Bernardino National Forest. Expect this area as well as the Owens Valley and the Colorado River Valley to see gusty north winds throughout the day. The north winds will gradually shift to the northeast toward evening which will cause winds over the Santa Clarita Valley, Ventura County and Santa Ana Canyon to increase to 20-30 mph by daybreak Thursday. Temperatures will be 10-15 degrees warmer over Southern California today with valley highs close to 80 degrees. Further warming can be expected Thursday with lower 90s possible across Southern California. Minimum relative humidity (RH) will drop toward the 10-15 percent range over a few areas by Thursday afternoon. Meanwhile, further north, the San Joaquin Valley will see a return of night through morning low clouds into the weekend. The low pressure will drift eastward by Saturday, allowing a weak trough to enter the region. Isolated showers may occur over Monterey County Saturday night and Sunday, but no significant rain is expected through the period. Temperatures this weekend will be cooler over Southern California with a likely return of night and morning coastal stratus. Slightly warmer weather may return next Monday.
